These powers took the field with great armies. On the frontier between Holland and the Upper Rhine 200 000 soldiers were marching towards Paris. Fifty six thousand Prussians, twentyfive thousand Hessians, Saxons and Bavarians, threatened the Rhine from Basis to Mayence and Coblents. From this point to the Meuse thirty thousand men occupied Luxemburg. Sixty thousand Austrians and ten thousand Prussians were marching toward the Meuse, while forty thousand English, Hanoverians and Dutch were advancing through Holland toward the French threatened the southeast. In France itself whole than a victory of our arms upon the field. provinces and large cities, such as Lyons, Touion and Orleans were in arms against the Republic, the revolt in La Vender being most formidable and for a time successful, its leaders having nearly a hundred thousand armed followers, and from their possession of the sea coasts having free communication with the English, from whom they received supplies and assistance.

To meet these various enemies the French convention at first called out 500,000 men. It was determined to keep the def neive on the east unil south; to semain in observation along dead had been picked up by our men, that had supposed to be about 35,000. the Pytennes and the coast, and to act on the off-nsive only in the north where, as General not been carried off. DEMOURIEZ said, " there can be no defense but by battles." To execute this plan, 150,000 men were to occupy Belgium, and to cover the frontier from Dunkirk to the Mense and the Sarre; 150,000 to extend themselves along the Rhine and the Vosges, from Mayence to Besancon and Gez. Lastly, a reserve was prepared at Chalons with the requisite material, ready to proceed to any quarter where it might be wanted. Savoy
